Yet in recent days it has become clear – after President Obama's testimony Tuesday night – that in his first press conference since winning the presidential election, the president is still trying to distance himself from a subject that is at the heart of the Russia investigation: his administration's decision to withhold documents and to make unsubstantiated claims of election hacking. The decision to withhold information from congressional investigators during the campaign, and to provide inaccurate responses to news reports, led to multiple congressional investigations, and is continuing to prompt questions about the potential for tampering with the presidential elections to the detriment of both Democratic and Republican candidates.. Lynch also announced that the White House has already begun preparing a document dump of information about potential ties between the Trump campaign and the Russian government. Those efforts will be conducted separately from the information already available to investigators, and will take place from the Trump transition team until Mr. Trump takes office, Ms. Lynch said. According to President Obama, the president can expect to see that materials regarding the election are coming out, but that any effort may not be able to reach all the documents required to determine if a campaign or the Russians had any influence on the election outcome.. In an interview with reporters Thursday afternoon at the White House, Attorney General Loretta Lynch confirmed the administration's decision, but insisted that President-elect Trump should make an announcement by January 20 regarding his plans to share information about Russia and the election. During the interview with NPR, Lynch noted she has had calls from her colleagues in Congress for Mr. Trump to clarify his positions about whether or not he would like the documents to be released, and for the Trump transition team to release information regarding any discussions with Russian government officials and anyone involved in the 2016 campaign.. "There's no denying that there are elements or sources of these allegations that we are looking at right now," Ms. Lynch said. "We will be sharing with anyone in any capacity that information that we find that we think might be relevant in some way, shape, or form to the investigation."
