Rheumatoid arthritis (RA) is a chronic disease characterized by a variable clinical course and unmet medical needs. Despite the current knowledge about immunopathogenesis of RA, so far there is no evidence of curative therapy. The best medical treatment available to control joint inflammation is administration of nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs). Recent advances in the field of hematopoietic and mesenchymal stem cell therapy have been promising as an alternative approach to treat RA. Advantages of these approaches in the treatment of RA include the ability to deliver cells to joints, their low immunogenicity and the absence of adverse effects. However, drawbacks include the need for multiple intravenous or intramuscular injections. Moreover, stem cell therapy may take several months to be effective. Therefore, the clinical application of cell therapy in RA is still at the stage of experimental studies, and a considerable amount of effort is required to develop appropriate cells, strategies for cell culture and implantation and safety protocols.
